

LITERARY NOTES.

In a review of the latest volume of New-England stories "The London Spectator" says that "there is a sort of pathos—which we may cite Dickens's as the most telling type—which is ostentatious pathos. It is the kind of pathos which the actors deserve as represented by 'tears in the voice.' The New-England pathos is of an exactly opposite kind. It is perfectly calm and tranquil, but all the more piercing for its self-restraint."

The Appletons announce a handsome new edition of Lovell's "History of England in the Eighteenth Century." It is to be published in twelve volumes £12m., seven volumes being given to England and two to Ireland.

The Rev. E. E. Hale's reminiscences of his Boston boyhood in the "Atlantic" are full of interest. There is an amusing account of his first speech, his recital in school, when a very small boy, of a poem by Tom Moore. "I stepped on the stage, frightened, but willing to do as I had been told, made my bow and began:

"Ay, down to the dust with them, slaves at they are!"

I had been told that I must stamp my foot at the words "down to the dust with them," and I did, though I hated to, and was sore afraid. Naturally enough, all the boys, one hundred and fifty of them, laughed at such an exhibition of passion from one of the smallest of their number. All the same, I plodded on; but alas, I came inevitably to the other line,

"If there linger one spark of their fire, tread it out!" and here I had to stamp again, as much to the boys' amusement as before. I did not get a "good mark" for speaking then, and I never did afterward. But the exercise did what it was meant to do; that is, it taught us not to be afraid of the audience. And this, so far as I know, is all of education that can be taught, or need be tried for. I owe to the public school and to this now despised exercise of declamation that ease before an audience which I share with most New-Englanders. This is to say that I owe to it the great pleasure of public speaking when there is anything to say. I think most public men will agree with me that this is one of the most exquisite pleasures of life."

The "Scribner" essayist notes how little real use fiction has ever been able to make of the Perfect Person. "The man who yields to no assaults of passion does not injustice, harbors no illusions and maintains his affections even fresh and warm, is an ideal precious to every heart not warped out of all capacity for ideals; and imaginative literature, to be of more than the day, has always had to give, and always will have to give, at least sufficient glimpses and intuitions of him to keep the ideal quick and gracious. Whenever a complete portrayal of him has been undertaken, however, by presenting him as an actor in the living scene, it has been more or less of a failure, so far as I recall, except when he has been kept to a subordinate role."

Dressell had a most convenient and comfortable fashion of acknowledging presentation copies of books. "Mr. Dressell," he would write, "presents his compliments to Mr. X, and will lose no time in perusing his interesting work." This is decided a model to imitate.
